
When Kodak introduced their brand new digital camera in the early 2000s, they decided to create a serial number for it. The serial number was also used in order to download software updates and such. A handful of years later, when the company folded, they made every effort to cancel or invalidate all these numbers. However, when Kodak had issued their last update for this model in 2010 and announced that the numbers were no longer valid -- they completely forgot about them... until now! They've recently found a box of old CD-ROMs containing all these serial numbers and will be releasing them online with the hope of getting back access to some lost data. While searching for files from a lost camera, an IT admin from Rochester Community and Technical College found a CD-ROM labeled "KODAK Software Update Serial Number Disc" which contained 3,000 unique serial numbers. The admin claims that by using the company's online support tools, they were unable to locate the proper software. The plan is to let everyone know about the lost data and while they'll only be able to connect with a small percentage of them, there may actually be some people that will be able to recover precious photos and videos shortly. Kodak will also be releasing a few other discs that contain serial numbers and other info in hopes of locating more people with lost files. Although the discs aren't expected to contain anything useful, it's still worth a shot for anyone looking to recover lost files. The biggest problem about this project is that Kodak has only 1,700 employees left after closing several factories back in 2012. All of which are based overseas...
